Melinda Coss runs The Handmade Soap Company in West Wales. Her soaps are sold at the exclusive L'Atelier du Savon in the Marais district of Paris and she also supplies some of the most prestigious hotels and stores in London. A regular contributor to magazines, she has also appeared on television and is the author of a wide range of craft books including the forthcoming Gourmet Soap Made Easy, also published by New Holland.

I am an experienced soapmaker and got this book for new recipe ideas. There are some beautiful photos of soap however sometimes attempts were made with photographs to make them so artistic (lighting from underneath, soap buried in dried rosebuds) as to not actually allow you to see what the soap looked like. A lot of the photos show dry, crumbly soap which in some cases can mean it was lye heavy. There are some good recipe ideas although I have never considered shortening to be a "natural" soap ingredient nor do I ever consider synthetic fragrance oils to come under the realm of "natural" nor do I consider food dyes to be so. The cucumber soap recipe calls for a preservative but I have never found that necessary in my vegetable or fruit soaps. Tallow is used several times (called "drippings" since the author is from Wales) which in the United States isn't nearly as readily available although I was able to order some online.
